Auxiliary Workers

The girls in the British Women's Auxiliary Army Corps in France are not only as ready to die for their country as any British soldier, but they already have their rell of honor. In a recent air raid nine "Tommy Waacs" lost their lives. Mrs. Philip Warren organizing secretary for the English Y. W. C. A., who is now in America, has just received a letter describing the military funeral given the victims. "Before us were rows of plain wooden crosses marking the graves of men who had fallen," said the writer, "but now women's graves were to be added to the number.

"First came the khaki-clad men, leading the way; then the khrki-clad women, and then a gun carriage, covered with the Union Jack, with two girls marching on either side. Then came more girls, marching four abreast, and at regular intervals eight more gun carriages.

and at regular intervals eight more gun carriages.

"When the procession reached the little cemetery on the hill the gun carriages were reverently unloaded by the men. The firing party detached itself from the rest. A familiar sound—the distant whirring of an airplane—broke the solemn stillness of the moment. An anti-aircraft gun barked out defiance. Soon the words of the burial service were over, the last salute was fired, and as the final notes of the 'Last Post' died away these nine young victims, the first of their corps to die for England, were laid to rest."

MRS. KENNY LIPZIN

Mrs. Kenny Lipzin, for years a favorite on the stage of the Ghetto and known to her admirers as "the Yiddish Bernhardt," died here yesterday from cancer. She was born in Russin sixty-eight years ago, and was for years a star at East Side theatres. She left the stage last February. Followers of Yiddish drama remember her best for her work in Jacob Gordon's plays. Chief among these were "The Orphan ' "Medea" and "The Slaughter."
